- TUC calls on the UK government and companies to work together to future-proof jobs at risk of offshoring.
- The union body estimates that between 368 thousand and 667 thousand jobs could be offshored from Britain if industries fail to meet climate targets and the UK falls behind other countries on climate action.
- North West England, Yorkshire and the Humber, and West Midlands are regions with most jobs at stake.

Why does falling behind on climate action put jobs at risk?

In 2021, crucial decisions will be taken about how the UK economy will change over the following decades to meet climate targets and eliminate greenhouse gas emissions. While the UK prepares to host the COP26 UN climate talks in Glasgow, several far-reaching climate action policies await publication, including the Net Zero Buildings and Heat Strategy and the overarching Net Zero Strategy, as well as a Comprehensive Spending Review which will shape public investment in climate action for forthcoming years. The decisions taken now can make or break the future of many of the UK's manufacturing jobs.

Safeguarding the UK's climate action: carbon
TUC analysis: between 300 thousand jobs could be lost if industries fail to meet climate targets and the UK falls behind other countries on climate action.
